hmmmm. so we talked about forgiveness in my honors class today and my brain is all wrapped around it so i might do some poetic stuff about that

- what is forgiveness
- who is it for? the giver or the reciever? the wronger or the victim?
- is it okay to ask for forgiveness?
- are you obligated to give forgiveness?
- what does a sunflower have to do with forgiveness? oooh this is so poetic <333 the context is we're reading a book called the sunflower and the image isn't used in the book quite in the frame of forgiveness but it's still important and i wanted to see if i can spin it?? maybe? hmm I think that could make a super interesting poem ^^

these questions probably not answered and more asked in this day's installment of Wolfe doesn't know how to write poetry (psst lying is bad Wolfe ://) <3<333

20. how to forgive

sunflowers were my mother favorite.
her childhood was spoiled with memories of sunflower fields, freshly bloomed in the heart of summer, grass up to her ankles as she waded between their giant, leafy arms. often, she was alone with her thoughts, with the wind swaying those giant stalks.
and she told me that she thought a lot about those families of flowers almost identical, bundled together, growing from the same soil, all with golden manes or crowns, just peeking up at the sun in the hopes of growing a little stronger the next day.

i'd always thought sunflowers were about love, from the "he loves me" to the "he loves me not"s until its petals littered my feet, and all that was left was its soul and i still didn't know the answer to how to feel better about love.
(especially when that love cut into your already scarred heart) but sitting among those flowers, gazing at the rolling hills filled to the brim with beautiful flowers grasping at the same sky showed me that love is less about the number of petals on a sunflower and more about loving those you surround yourself with.

idk what im doing here<3<33<33<3<33333333

- clean the pan my roomie left in the sink ruuuuude
